

To Whom It May Concern:

I believe that providing law enforcement with untethered access to monitor Americans' phone and internet access would be a slap in the face for everything America stands for. Such a law would be a mockery of justice. We have a right to the freedom of privacy. We have the right as Americans to not live in a police state, where we could potentially have files stored in a database in Washington that profiles us based on our internet traffic or phone conversations. The danger in this sort of unrestricted access is very real.
